Ballot Measure #1	No	A Health Freedom Perspective Health freedom depends on limited, accountable government, including how government handles our money. Florida already has a constitutionally protected rainy-day fund. Amendment 1 asks whether the state should be allowed to retain substantially more taxpayer money, raising the cap from 10% to 25% of general revenue collections. Preparing for emergencies is responsible. But so is asking whether excess revenue should continue accumulating in government accounts or remain available for tax relief and taxpayers. How much of our money should government be allowed to keep simply because it can?
Ballot Measure #3	Yes	A Health Freedom Perspective: Health freedom is ultimately about a larger principle: government should have limits, and individuals and families should have greater control over their own lives, property, and resources. Amendment 3 challenges the assumption that ever-growing government requires ever-growing revenue from Florida families. Instead of asking how much government can afford to give up, Floridians should also be asking how much government truly needs to spend. There is also a fundamental question of ownership. Even after a family pays off its mortgage, failure to pay property taxes can ultimately put that home at risk. Amendment 3 moves Florida toward reducing that perpetual government claim on a family's primary residence. Opponents warn that reducing property-tax revenue could force local governments to cut services or find revenue elsewhere. That concern deserves consideration. But so does another question: Should government's first response to less revenue be finding another way to tax Floridians, or finding ways to become smaller, more efficient, and more accountable? From a health freedom perspective, protecting individual liberty means more than protecting medical decisions. It means protecting the independence that allows families to make those decisions for themselves in the first place.
