Stand for Health Freedom Reports 703 Election Victories Nationwide, With 161 Races Still Pending

Nonpartisan health freedom organization reports a 63% win rate in decided races, with major victories in state legislatures where health freedom policy takes shape.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

TAMPA, Fla. — While national headlines focus on losses among high-profile candidates associated with the Make America Healthy Again (MAHA) movement, Stand for Health Freedom (SHF) is reporting a different set of election results.

In the November 3 general election, 703 of SHF's 1,122 supported candidates in decided races won their elections, a 63% win rate, with another 161 races still pending.

That's 703 victories across the country, with more results yet to come.

The numbers offer an important distinction in the post-election conversation: MAHA and health freedom are not interchangeable, and the outcomes of a handful of high-profile races do not represent the results of every organization working on health freedom issues.

Stand for Health Freedom is a nonpartisan organization focused on five foundational principles to put individuals back in the driver's seat of their health: informed consent, parental rights, religious freedom, free speech, and privacy. Its Vote for Health Freedom initiative evaluates candidates on their positions and records on these issues, not their political party.

The Biggest Story May Be in the Statehouses

While national election coverage has concentrated on federal and gubernatorial races, many of SHF's most significant victories came in state legislative contests.

That's no coincidence. It's where SHF has invested for years.

SHF believes in strong states' rights and has built its strategy around the understanding that some of the most consequential health freedom battles are fought and won in state legislatures. That's why SHF invests heavily in relationships with state legislators, candidate education, grassroots engagement, and model legislation that lawmakers can introduce in their own states.

The goal has never been simply to win the biggest races. It's to build the relationships, legislative knowledge, and grassroots support needed to turn election victories into meaningful policy.

Building Beyond Election Day

SHF's Vote for Health Freedom initiative is part of a long-term effort to educate voters, evaluate candidates, build relationships with lawmakers, and support policies that protect individual and family freedoms.

The organization will continue tracking outstanding election results while preparing for the next legislative sessions across the country.

For SHF, Election Day is not the finish line. It's the beginning of the next phase of work.
